3 Ways to Help Your Child Communicate with Peers

As communication becomes more instant through e-mail, texting and messaging through social-networking sites, there is a risk of more shallow—and impulsive—conversation between kids. Here are a few tips for helping your child avoid sending "mixed signals."

1. If your child is upset at a peer, encourage him or her to avoid texting (where messages are necessarily much shorter) and to have an in-person conversation.
2. Offer yourself as a sounding board. If your child plans to talk in person or over the phone about an important issue, say, "Would you like to go through it with me, so you can make sure you say it just the way you want to?"
3. Encourage your child to read through any e-mail, text messages or social-networking messages before sending them. A good general policy is to avoid saying something online that one would not feel comfortable saying in person.
